Gen. McGinnis Gets a Letter from South Dakota Bachelor.

Postmaster George F. McGinnis is not a matrimonial agent, although he has been accused of it. A letter from a lone and forlorn, but hopeful bachelor was received by the postmaster yesterday, and in it was a tale of woe that can only be appreciated by men happily married.

A farmer who is, as he says himself "fair to middlin' rich" in Riverside, S. D .a place that is generally believed to be the home of many grass widows-wrote General McGinnis to either find for him a tion with the "leadin' marriage paper of the General McGinnis doesn't know which paper is the "leadin'" one, and will not reply to the letter. From the writer's description of himself and his statements as to his position in the community in which he resides, he is an eligible person, providing the applicant for his hand does not become discouraged by his chirography. General McGinnis has scratched the signature from the letter, but has it marked blotter, and if any young lady in Indianapolis wants to try her hand in the ountry where the "sky is its own blue blue" she can be directed to a man who is willing to hold it by the postmaster of In-ian Who Hitched His Wagon to Dan Reid's Star Regards the Future Optimistically.

George P. Early, a former Richmond man, who was so fortunate as to hitch his wagon to Dan Reid's star and as a result is now in that position graphically termed 'on Easy street," has been in the city for several days renewing old acquaintances and incidentally keeping his eyes on some legislation pending before the General Assembly. Mr. Early is at present connected with the claim department of the American Tin Plate Company, which has large interests in Indiana, and he has been giving his attention to the bill, killed in the Senate, that prohibited foreign corporations from holding coal lands in Indiana. The company with which he is identified has acquired coal properties in this State as a protection against the giving out of natural gas.

Mr. Early, as might naturally be expected, does not agree with some of the popular conceptions, or misconceptions of trusts. He sees "sermons in stones and good in everything"-even in the thing known as a trust. Last evening at the English he got started on this theme and he quickly waxed warm and eloquent in his argument.

"There has been a great deal said upon the subject of trusts, so-called, both for and against them," he began. "The opposition has usually taken a violent form of expression, not unlike that which censured the famous crime of 1873, but which has since been condoned by the American people, with the exception of Mr. Bryan, who is now generally supposed to be in a hopeless minority, although 'willin',' to borrow from an old friend, Barcus, to suffer the annoyances and vexations and speechmaking necessities incident to presidential it is supposed to be over two years. candidacy-but I am drifting away with Mr. Bryan.

TWO CAUSES OF HOSTILITY. "The hostile sentiment against trusts, which is thrilling the cockles of the Democratic heart, is due principally to two causes. First, the inherent and uncontrollable passion for opposing on general principles; the second cause of opposition is due chiefly to a misapprehension as to the nature and operations of a trust.

"What is generally termed a trust is not a trust, for a trust implies a trustee and a beneficiary. The trust, as the word is now commercially used, is a corporation organized for the purpose of carrying on a business, which has heretofore been conducted by men as individuals, or as partners, or by smaller corporations. The trust or new corporation is formed by each man, or set of partners, or stockholders of smaller corporations, selling their respective properties to the new corporation or trust and receiving in payment therefor certificates of stock in the trust or new corporation, cash, as the case may be, but usually stock. This is a lawful proceeding, for the reason that every man has a constitutional right to engage in any lawful business, and so have two or more men a perfect right to form a partnership to conduct a lawful business, and likewise have a set of men a right to form a corporation, under the laws of the States, to conduct a lawful business. "The man, the partners and the corporaion have not only the right to conduct a lawful business, but they have the right to dispose of their respective businesses and in the manner involved in the formation of a trust or new corporation. It would be manifestly absurd to say that a man or firm or corporation should not be permitted to dispose of a business as a whole. If they were not permitted to do so, how could they quit when they wanted to if they were still solvent? Shall we say that a man or woman may be divorced from vorced, so to speak, from his business?

USUAL OBJECTIONS. "The usual objections to trusts are, first, that they are not compelled to reveal to the public an account of their operations; second, that they usually raise prices; third, that they stifle competition and diminish the opportunities for individual ef-

"Certainly a man has a right to possess alone the secrets of his business-the amount of his sales, the expenses, the bills receivable, the bills payable, net earnings, etc. No one has a right to know these facts excepting the man himself. or one from whom he seeks credit. The same rule of right applies to a firm or a corporation. But, you say, if one buys the stock of a trust he may pay too much for it, because he doesn't know what it is really worth, because there has been no public statement of its operation. Carlyle once enumerated the population of England. and brusquely remarked, 'they were mostly fools.' Without any intention of personal reflection, I suppose the same ratio will apply in the domains of Uncle Sam. If we are going to legislate for the benefit of unwise people for their guidance in making investments, we shall have an interminable session of legislatures.. A man who has sufficient intelligence to seek shelter during a shower, if he is not equipped with a mackintosh or a friend's umbrella, will fully investigate the value of any property before he buys it. There are already ample facilities for putting 'a wise guy next,' as Bill Devery, of New York, would

TRUSTS AND COMPETITION.

"Do trusts stifle competition? It is an old saying that 'competition is the life of trade.' Trade has no life without profit. Competition is more frequently the death of business. It is unhealthy for business men when production exceeds consumption. Excessive production means stagnation of business, lower prices, lower wages, ensuitable wife or else put him in communica- forced idleness, a curtailment of the purchasing power of the wage earner and general commercial depression. Individual concerns in their greed for business overproduce and industrial activity ensues, with all of its calamitous effects. A trust regulates the production of its products so that the sale of the same may be made at a profit, thereby causing more constant employment, regular wages and the avoidance of industrial panics. But competition is not destroyed, for if a man thinks favorable of a business he may buy the stock of the trust and share in its profits without being obliged to invest directly in an entire enterprise, and thus avoid all the worry and vexation of a business under personal control. The workmen may, too, become shareholders in the trust of business, a thing they could not do under individual management.

part of legislators of a luxuriant growth of hair to assume an unfriendly attitude toward foreign corporations. There is probably no State in the Union that has not been benefited by the influx of foreign capital, and the legislator should not forget that the foreign investor assumes as much risk in investing his capital in a foreign State as the State incurs in having him go so. Capitalists are usually pretty slick people, but they never slide knowingly on thin ice. Our Populistic friends are usually flat enough, but are seldom broad enough

ING THINGS THOROUGHLY.

His Wife Thought He Was a Good Provider, but Her Awakening Was a Bitter One.

When Patrolman Albert Smith arrested Frank G. Schultz, a machinist employed at the Atkins saw works, he was not aware that he had caught a clever shoplifter. Schultz was arrested in the Courthouse grocery, at Alabama and Washington streets, while trying to purloin a package of coffee. Later, when the police searched Schultz's house, they found that Schultz had stolen enough groceries to keep him nearly a year. He did not confine his peculations entirely to groceries, but took hardware of all descriptions and dry goods. How long Schultz has carried on his systematic stealing is not exactly known, but He was caught by one of the clerks in the Courthouse grocery at 6 o'clock last after he had purchased some goods. The clerk was ready to give Schultz his liberty when Patrolman Smith walked into the store. The clerk then told the policeman what had taken place. Smith took Schultz to the police station and charged him with petit larceny. After his arrest Schultz for a time maintained silence regarding his past affairs, and the police were nclined to think that it was not his first attempt at stealing. Captain Kruger about that time went on night duty, and when he saw Schulz he recognized him as a shoplifter whom he had arrested several years ago. Kruger at once dispatched several policemen to Schultz's house on Lord street and had it searched. FILLED A SPRING WAGON.

When the police had finished their work they had to call for a light spring wagon to carry away all the goods they recovered. The list included many pounds of different brands of coffee, fifteen pounds of tea, wrapped in packages, cereals of all brands, gloves of many kinds and patterns, several large cakes of beeswax, a basketful of bar soap, several pounds of mixed spices. twenty cans of fish of various kinds, glasses of jelly and preserves, and a basket containing 150 files and several small saws and plates of steel from which saws After the plunder was taken to the police station Schultz was taken from his cell and confronted with it. He denied stealing any of it until Kruger asked him what he wanted with such a large supply of groceries. He told so many conflicting stories about the prices of the goods in the presence of the police and the clerk from the grocery that he saw it was futile for him each other and yet a man may not be di- to further deny his guilt. He then admitted stealing all the groceries. He said the 150 "rat tail" files in the basket were given him by the firm he worked for, as they were considered of no value. While Schultz was in the office of the captain telling of the goods he stole the police also brought in his wife. After her husband had been locked up she was questioned about the goods and said she was always under the impression that he had purchased them.

HE WAS "A GOOD BUYER." She said she thought he was a good buyer. as he always came home with more groceries than she had asked him to purchase. One night when he returned home with two dozen white canvas gioves, she asked him what he intended to do with them. He replied that he had bought them for $1 and would use them in handling coal. She explained then, she said, that for a man who earned $1.35 a day the purchase was rather an expensive one. She said whenever her husband came home with extra goods, such as the collection before her represented, she always asked him about it, and he would tell her that he had economized on one or more purchases to buy something else. When she realized that her husband was a self-confessed thief she raved madly and declared that she would have nothing further to do with him. She was also held by the police.

Captain Kruger last night said that Schultz was caught shoplifting a few years ago when he stole a number of books from the old Bowen-Merrill store. His habit at that time was to walk into the store, and, after looking over the great stacks of books, walk calmly out with one of them. He did this on several occasions, Kruger said, until he had a good-sized library at his home. He was arrested for this offense and served a long sentence in the workhouse. Schultz lives at 908 Lord street.

Seven Places and the Watchman was Obdurate.

The semi-annual conference of the Mornight trying to steal a package of coffee, | mon Church of Indiana was not opened in the Criminal Court room last night, as scheduled by President Francis M. Shafer, of the Indiana Conference. According to programme the opening meeting was to have been held last night and this afternoon a mass meeting of Indiana Mormons, of which there are said to be more than two hundred, was to have been held and to-night another business session, at which President Woodruff, of the Northern States' Mission was to have expounded the doctrines of the Church of the Latter Day Saints, had been advertised. The conference was scheduled for the Criminal Court room without the permission of either Judge Alford, the Board of County Commissioners, or last, but not least, of the custodian of the building, but, through the objection of the latter, the programme was spoiled at the beginning.

Last night about 7:30 o'clock one male Mormon, accompanied by six contemporaries in the faith, female Mormons, appeared at the west door of the courthouse and started to enter the building. The night watchman stopped him with a request to know his business in the halls of justice at that time of the night, and he answered that a meeting of Mormons was to be held in the Criminal Court room. The watchman said that he hadn't heard of it, and hardly believed there would be a meeting, as the Criminal Court room was locked in seven places and the custodian had told him nothing about unlocking it. The Mormon expostulated, but the night watchman was obdurate and refused to "open up." He told the applicant that he could not violate his orders, and, although he had 'no personal interest in the Mormon Church, he would be glad to accommodate the gentleman if it were in his power. The Mormon became impatient, and so did his contemporaries. When their impatience was exhausted they concluded that there would be no meeting, and left the building, promising that they would see if it could not be arranged to-day. It is not known whether President Shafer has made

We always did have a good opinion of the lasting qualities of a Majestic Range and our claims for it on this score may have at times seemed exaggerated. The following incident, however, proves that we have been too modest, if anything, and ought to convince the most skeptical that it pays to buy a Majestic.

On the night of Sept. 15, 1902, fire was discovered in the kitchen of Mr. W McLaughlin's residence, 2329 Broadway. The fire department arrived in ime to save the house, but the kitchen and all its contents, excepting a Majestic Range, were destroyed. The heat was so intense that the range glowed white. While in this condition, a stream of water was thrown upon it. Such treatment as this would have converted an ordinary range into a pile of junk in just two seconds. Not so with the Majestic. It was made to withstand rough usage and passed through the ordeal like a phoenix. Not a nickel was spent on repairs and the range is giving the same excellent service to-day that it did before the fire.
